curring sheds are like some seen in Chemung, nothing extra, but many are building new and model ones after the following pattern: There is a basement cellar dug and stoned up nine feet deep, or say five feet under ground and four feet above, upon which the frame superstructure is placed. There are windows placed at selves as C. L. Northrup and Robert Blaco, proper distances in the cellar walls. Over this cellar there is a permanent floor placed with trap doors, the floor built strong enough to hold a team and loaded wngon. At proper intervals joists are placed on the upper tiers to piace the lath with the tobacco hung. After the tobacco is sufficiently cured, and when the grower is ready to strip, he does not have to wait for a damp day, but will take his tobacco and let it down through the trap doors and hang it in the cellar where it will sufficiently moisten to strip. Another advantage from the cellar and trap doors is, if the curing season is very dry they can open the doors and let | tion with Jonas A. while, Oct. $1.05, 20.2 her sept. $1.00.2 her s was in danger. Suddenly, however, he heard the second engine dashing over the rails, and before he could do anything to prevent it, if anything were possible in 400; such a case, it erashed into the rear ear of $5.00600; Minne his train, the locomotive breaking up across the track and the tender leaping to one side. In an instant the escaping water from the boiler had been forced upon the passengers. The cries and curses of men were mingled with the shrieks of agony of the women and the wailing of little ones. The appeals for aid were piteous indeed. Relief quickly came from the villagers. Their houses Lard firm; city kettle at 84c; loose were thrown open and the wounded were speedily being soothed by the inmates. Two physicians, Messrs. Gill and Ingersoll, were summoned, and with flour and sweet oil, did all in their power to relieve the scalded sufferers.

A train fitted out for the relief of the wounded by some mismanagement did not get to the scene until 10 o'clock, and at Atlantic City the railway officials could not relieve the suspense of the waiting hundreds, and in the midst of a blinding rain storm men, women and children plodded through the sand from house to house inquiring after the injured or urging the railway telegraph operator to send their friends word of their safety.

Hunting the Employees. As to the engineer of the second section, all that is known of him is that he leaped from the cab with the fireman before the collision, and that both fled. It was well they did, for searching parties, composed of men, some of whom were armed with knives or revolvers, were organized for lynching purposes. There are those who say the engineer whistled down brakes, but that they failed to work on the wet track. The most prevalent opinion, however, is that the engineer lost his head, and that finding himself so near the first train, he was unable to do more than to jump for his own life. His name was Eggins, of Camden, and he was considered a capable man. Hogan was the conductor, but he has no explanation to make. At Atlantic City, amid intense excitement, an attempt was made to mob the railroad employees. A freight clerk was assaulted with a pistol, but he knocked his assailant down and ran. The other railroad men were compelled to change their clothing. It may take an official investigation to determine the entire causes of the disaster. and to fairly fix the responsibility for it. It seems now clear only that the second section was runahead of its time, that the first had properly slowed up and started to run on the siding to allow the passage of the 5:30 express from Camden. scalding nearly every passenger in it. The headlight of the locomotive was broken off, the smoke-stack was broken off, the cowcatcher was broken down and the tender was broken loose from the engine. The excursionists nearly all got out of the train. The children were thrown out of the window and many people jumped through them. They ran through the creek into the meadow.
